I really don't believe that broadband over power lines will be an asset in the future with so many options available already.

When you weigh the positives with the negatives on this issue, its clear that the negative impacts out weigh any possible positive ones.

Before even considering such a feat, I would think there would be more research and testing on the effects of broadband transmission over power lines, and the effects it would have with RFI and such.

How would it be stopped in the middle of the National Radio Quiet Zone for Greenbank, WV for example?
